ANECDOTES OF SIR EDWIN LANDSEER.

Although numerous incidents in the life of Sir Edwin Landseer have appeared both in English and American journals since his death, there seems no diminution of interest in the details of the artistic career of this wonderful painter of animals. A lengthy article which recently appeared in the Cornhill Magazine gives a fresh insight into his early life, and a clearer idea of his characteristic traits, than can be obtained by most of the formal biographies which have been written. In our brief space we can only abridge a few isolated facts or incidents.

When a baby boy Edwin Landseer delighted to draw from copies set him by mother and sisters, only he complained then of their sameness, and his wise father bid him take Nature as his copy. In the South Kensington Museum is a little picture of a ducky, marked "E. Landseer, five years old." Another drawing of a pointer culling his tail was sketched at the age of six. Two developed the fairy gift with which young Edwin was born; at eight he was always drawing animals, although when a mere lad he painted in oil the portrait of his baby sister, toddling about in a big bonnet. He was a pretty little curly-headed boy when he entered the Royal Academy as a student, and there attracted Fuseli's attention by his talents and gentle manners. Fuseli would look around for him and say, "Where is my little dog-boy?" Perhaps the secret of the little "dog-boy's" success lay partially in his love for animals. Certainly he understood how to deal with them, and his wonderful power over them is well known. An illustrious lady once asked him how he gained this influence. "By peering into their hearts, ma'am," was his answer. A large party of his friends were with him at his house in St. John's Wood on one occasion; his servant opened the door, three or four dogs rushed in, one a very fierce-looking mastiff. The ladies recoiled, but the creature bounded up to Landseer, treating him like an old friend, with most expressive demonstrations of delight. Some one remarking how fond the dogs seemed of him, he said, "I never saw it before in my life." On another occasion he came in from his meadow, somewhat disheveled and tired. "What have you been doing?" asked a friend. "Only teaching some horse tricks for Astley's; and here is my whip," he said, showing a piece of sugar in his hand. He said that breaking in horses meant more, often breaking their hearts, and torturing them of all their spirit. Landseer's studio was a charming place, and much frequented by the elite of London society. No one was more often there than D'O'Ryan, with his good-humored face, ready wit, and delicate flattery. "Landseer," he would call out, at his entrance, "keep the dog off"—referring to the painted ones; "I want to come in, and some of them will bite me—and that fellow in the corner is growling furiously." The same visitor one day gravely asked for a pin, and when it was given him, with the inquiry what he wanted it for, he replied, "To take the throat out of that dog's foot; do you not see what pain he is in?" In that same studio, so dear to him, Landseer wished to die. To the very end he did not give up his work. When he was almost at his worst they gave him his easel and canvases and left him in his studio, hoping that work might help him forget his suffering. When his attendants came back they found that he had painted the picture of a little lamb lying beside a lion. This and "The Font" were Landseer's last pictures. "The Font" is an allegory of all creeds and all created things coming together in the light of truth. It is now owned by the Queen. She wrote to her old friend and expressed her admiration for it, and asked to become the possessor. Her interest and sympathy brightened the sadness of the last days of Edwin Landseer.

ARSENIC EATERS.—At a meeting of German natural philosophers in Vienna, Dr. Koapp introduced two arsenic eaters from Syria; the one ate 0.30 grammes of yellow sulphur of arsenic, the other 0.40 grammes of arsenic acid, in sight of the Assembly. In his lecture on the arsenic eaters Dr. Koapp said among other things: "It is difficult to give any certain particulars as to the increase in number of arsenic eaters. I have convinced myself that there exist many of them in Upper Syria, and also in Mesopotamia; very many stable boys, ostlers, woodcutters and foresters are known to me as arsenic eaters, even the female sex is addicted to the practice. Many began already at seventeen or eighteen years of age to take arsenic, and continued it to a great age. Most arsenic eaters keep the matter secret, so that it is impossible to give accurate statistics. They all assign as their motives for indulging in the habit that it prevents illness; further, their wish to look rosy and healthy; that it is a remedy against difficulty of breathing, and assists the digestion of indigestible food. A poacher in Upper Syria, who made experiments in my presence of eating arsenic, told me he had acquired courage by the habit. The appearance of the arsenic-eaters in all cases known to me is healthy and robust. I think only robust persons can become accustomed to the practice. Some of them attain a great age. Thus in Zeiring I saw a charcoal burner, upward of seventy, still strong and hearty, who I was told, had taken arsenic for more than forty years. I heard, too, of a chamois hunter of eighty-one, who had long been used to eat arsenic. I never observed an arsenic eater in those addicted to the habit. It certainly happened once that such an arsenic eater (a leather dresser's apprentice in Ligeia, 1865,) while intoxicated took too much, thereby poisoning himself severely. According to his own account he had taken a piece as large as a bean. He entirely recovered, however, and ate arsenic afterward, but more carefully. As far as my observations extend, white arsenic, (also called flowers of arsenic,) and the yellow arsenic, (orpiment,) are taken, and that in a dry state, alone, or on bread. The dose is of course very small at first, and is gradually increased, the largest quantity eaten in my presence by the poacher in Zeiring being fourteen grammes. A certain Mathew Scober, in Ligeia, ate seven and one-half grammes before me on the 17th of April, 1865. The intervals, too, at which arsenic is taken vary—every fortnight, every week, twice or three times a week. But I doubt as to the existence of arsenic eaters in Syria by the present experiments."
